Current book project:

This project focuses on explaining why some rebel groups are more successful than the great majority of counterparts in restricting factional splits, maintaining internal discipline, and advancing a coherent political agenda over the parochial concerns of fighters and supporters. Based upon comparative field research in Sudan and Somalia, this project identifies a wide range of performance among rebel groups, many of which are situated in roughly similar environments that include the challenges of organization in clan-based societies, neighboring states that cultivate and manipulate rebels as proxies, the material lures of foreign aid and other similarities in patterns of resources. The few rebel successes among these 'hard cases' that should promote factional splits and parochial agendas shed light on the causes of successful rebel organizational strategies. This project addresses scholarly debates concerning apparent global structural changes in the nature of rebel wars and the relationships between rebels and non-combatants.

Other Notable Professional Service

2009-10: Principle signatory to an amicus brief presented to the US Supreme Court pursuant to the case, Holder v. Humanitarian Law Project. This case concerns elements of the Patriot Act that criminalizes certain kinds of contact with groups designated as “terrorist organizations” under US law. Along with other signatories, I contended that the wording of the current law threatens the free conduct of research on conflict issues by exposing scholars to ambiguous threats of prosecution as unwitting supporters of “terrorist organizations.”

1990s-2000s: Testimony before the US House of Representatives, Sub-committee on African Affairs on Liberian civil war, before the US Senate Sub-committee on African Affairs on wars in Africa, and on the general situation concerning the Sierra Leone / Liberia war.

1999- 2001, Advisor to UN General-Secretary's office on war in Sierra Leone / Liberia

Since 1996: Service in advisory capacities on issues and policies related to conflicts in Africa to the governments of the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Norway, and Denmark and Germany.
